Fund Review and Strategy

As at the end of the reporting period, the Fund's total assets amounted to approximately GHS 226.6 million. Of this, GHS 179.2 million has been deployed across five unlisted debt investments, comprising GHS 118.7 million in cedi-denominated instruments and USD 5.4 million in U.S. dollar exposures. The balance remains invested in near-cash instruments, providing liquidity ahead of deployment into approved pipeline transactions.

The Fund delivered a YTD return of 5.77%, reflecting resilience despite prevailing downward pressure from a declining yield environment and recent policy rate actions. Importantly, the portfolio remains well positioned to benefit from any upward movements in yields.

Pipeline activity remains strong, with available cash expected to be fully deployed in the early part of Q2. We anticipate an acceleration in deal activity over the course of the year, supported by relatively tamed interest rates and the resumption of deferred capital expenditure programs by corporates.

Market Overview

Inflation edged higher, printing at 3.4% compared to 3.2% in the prior month, bringing to an end the 15-month disinflationary trend that began in January 2025. This modest reversal has been driven largely by rising oil prices, spurred by heightened geopolitical tensions stemming from the US-Iran conflict, which has disrupted global oil supply dynamics. The resulting increase in uncertainty around the inflation outlook has prompted a marginal upward adjustment in interest rate expectations, as investors reprice risk amid a relatively opaque macroeconomic environment. A definitive peace agreement between the US and Iran would help temper inflationary concerns; however, inflation dynamics typically lag real-economy developments and are subject to pass-through effects. In this context, investors may consider maintaining adequate allocations to cash and near-cash instruments, allowing flexibility to reposition along the yield curve should geopolitical tensions intensify or macro conditions deteriorate.
